

ADVENTURE IN HUNGARY.

On the third night after his departure from Vienna, a horse-dealer alighted at an inn situated at the entrance of a little town, which, to all appearance, was respectable and quiet. He recommended his horse to the care of the host, dried his clothes at the fire, and, as soon as supper was ready, sat down to the table with the host and his family, who appeared to be decent people.

During supper the traveller was asked where he came from, and on his answering from Vienna, they were all anxious to hear some news from the capital.—The horse-dealer told them all he knew. The landlord then asked him what business had taken him to Vienna, to which he replied that he had been there to sell some of the very finest horses that had ever appeared in that market.

At these words the landlord looked very significantly at a young man who sat opposite to him, and who appeared to be his son. His expressive glance did not escape the observation of the traveller, who, however, took no notice of it; yet he very soon afterwards had cause to regret his want of caution.—Being in want of repose, he begged the landlord, as soon as the supper was finished, to show him to his room. The landlord took a lamp and conducted the traveller across the yard into a detached building, which contained two tolerably neat rooms.

A bed was prepared at the further end of the second.

As soon as the landlord had retired, the traveller undressed himself, unbuttoned a money-belt containing a considerable sum in gold, and took out his pocket-book, which was full of bank notes. Having convinced himself that the money was right, he placed both under his pillow, extinguished the light, and soon fell asleep, thanking God and all the saints for the success of his journey. He had slept but an hour or two when he was suddenly awakened by the opening of a window, and immediately felt the night air blow on him.

Started at this unforeseen circumstance, the traveller raised himself up in bed, and perceived the head and shoulders of a man who was struggling to get in the room; at the same time he heard the voices of several persons standing near the window. A dreadful terror seized our traveller, who gave himself up for lost; and scarcely knowing what he did, he crept under the bed as quickly as possible. A moment afterwards a man sprang heavily into the room and staggered to the bed, supporting himself against the wall.

Confounded as the horse dealer was, he nevertheless perceived that the intruder was incriminated; this circumstance, however, gave him little hope, for he had probably got intoxicated in order to summon up courage for the contemplated crime; besides this, the traveller had heard the voice of persons outside, so that the murderer, in case of resistance, could be assisted by his comrades.

But how great was his astonishment when he saw the unknown person throw his coat upon the floor, and stretch himself upon the bed which he had just quitted! A few moments afterwards he heard the intruder snore, and his terror began gradually to give way to reflection, although the whole affair was quite incomprehensible to him. He was just preparing to quit his hiding place in order to wake the inmates of the house, and ask another bed in place of that from which he had been so unceremoniously expelled, when a new incident occurred. He heard the outer door carefully opened, and, on listening, the sound of cautious footsteps reached his ear. In a few moments the door of his room opened, and two figures, those of the landlord and his son, stood on the threshold.

"Keep the lamp back!" muttered the father in a low voice.

"What have we to fear?" said the young man—"we are two against one; besides, he has only a small knife with him, and is sleeping soundly—hear him snore."

"Do what I tell you!" said the father, angrily—"do you wish to awaken him? would you have him alarm the neighborhood?"

The horse-dealer was horrified with the spectacle. He remained motionless under the bed, scarcely daring to breathe. The son shut the door after him, and the two wretches approached the bed on tiptoe.

An instant afterwards the bed shook with a convulsive motion, and a stifled cry of pain confirmed the foreboding that the unhappy man had had his throat cut! After a short pause of most awful silence, the landlord said:

"It is over. Look for the money."

"I have found it under the pillow," exclaimed the son; "it is in a leather belt and a pocket book."

The murderers disappeared. Every thing now being quiet, the traveller crept from under the bed, jumped out of the window, and hastened to the ad-of what had happened. The mayor immediately assembled the military, and in less than three-quarters of an hour the inn was surrounded by soldiers, who had been summoned to arrest the murderers. The whole house seemed buried in profound silence; but on approaching the stables they heard a noise. The door was immediately broken in, and the landlord and his son were seen busily digging a pit. As soon as the murderers saw the horse-dealer, they uttered a cry of horror, covered their faces with their hands, and fell to the ground.

This was neither from repentance nor the fear of punishment, but they thought they saw the ghost of the murdered man, notwithstanding they heard him speak. There was some trouble in convincing them to the contrary. They were then bound and led to the out-house, where the horrible deed had been committed, anxious to see how the enigma would be solved.

The prisoners appeared tolerably collected—at least, calm and silent; but when, on entering the room, they perceived the body which lay on the bed, the son fell senseless to the floor and the father threw himself upon it, with loud lamentations, clasped the bloody corpse, and exclaimed, despairingly, "My son! O, my son! I, thy father, am thy murderer!"

The murdered man was, in fact, the youngest son of the host. Drunkenness was the only fault this young man had; and this night, instead of being, as his father and brother supposed, in his own bed, he had gone out secretly and been carousing with some of his companions at the ale-house. Soon becoming sufficiently inebriated, and fearing his father's anger, if he appeared before him in that state, he intended to pass the night in the detached out-house, as he had often done before. His companions had accompanied him thither, and helped him to climb up to the window—the rest requires no further explanation.

Nor we add that the murderers expiated their crimes with their lives, and that the horse-dealer, although saved and again in possession of his plundered property, still shudders at the recollection of that fatal night.

WHO ARE REBELS?

This is a pertinent inquiry just now—Who are rebels? On this point the New York Times says:—"Whoever is against the constitution in whole or in part, in spirit or in letter, is a rebel. Whoever is against any of the laws of our government, whether they relate to fugitive slaves or of freemen, is a rebel. Whoever insists that a law of Congress can be violated any more in New York or Massachusetts than in South Carolina is a rebel. Let us make a clean and clear work of our loyalty, and apply to it the rigid rule that who offends in one point offends in all."

We republish this because it is becoming more and more applicable every day as the republican leaders develop their policy. Applying this rule—and who will say it is not a just rule—how many rebels have we in Washington? Fifty-six rebels voted in the House the other day in favor of Ashley's bill, on a very light vote, less than half the House being present. The New York Tribune, the Evening Post, our morning contemporary, the Chicago Tribune, and nearly every one of the leading republican journals are rebel sheets according to this rule, and every constitutional Union man will admit that it is a just one.—Det. Persons about to marry, who wish to know the proper age, are referred to the following precedents: Adam and Eve, 6; Shakespeare, 18; Ben Johnson, 21; Walker, 24; Franklin, 24; Mozart, 25; Kenner, Fuller, Johnson, Burk, Scott, 26; Tycho Brahe, Byron, Washington, Wellington, Bonaparte, 27; Penn, Sterne, 28; Linnaeus, Nelson, 29; Burns, 30; Chaucer, Hogarth, Peel, 32; Walsworth, Davy, 33; Aristotle, 35; Sir William Jones, 37; Wilberforce, 38; Luther, 42; Addison, 44; Wesley, Young, 46; Swift, 49; Buffon, 53; Old Parr (last time), 120. If Adam and Eve got married before they were a year old, and the veteran Parr buckled with a widow at 120, bachelors and spinners may wed at any age they like, and find shelter under great names for either early marriage or late.

The Indians, in the mountains, says a California paper, have a cunning device, by which they can get within arrowshot of a deer. To accomplish this object, they stretch a bark string for a long distance, along the brow of a hill, almost as high from the ground as a deer's chest. The deer, coming across this obstacle, and not feeling always disposed to jump it, will follow the line, in hope for an opening to get by.—While performing this manoeuvre, he is very likely brought towards some ambush, from whence he gets an arrow in the ribs.
